I am and XM subscriber and am upset about any potential legislation limiting satellite radio's programming. If the big radio powerhouses want to compete fairly, they should work to make their product better, rather than use their financial and political clout to use the legislative process to further their own interests. I choose to pay for my radio so that I can have weather, traffic, and music when I want them, rather than when the radio stations deem I can have them. This should be a matter of personal choice, but with the radio outlets also having free choice as to what to broadcast and when, regardless of whether the content is local or national. People can make a choice. Free radio, with commercials and local programming whenever it should happen to come on, or for-fee radio, with the perk being I can get what I need when I need it. Isn't that the American way? Capitalism at it's finest!
